It is a syllabary, not a true alphabet. Unlike any other alphabet, each syllable of the Japanese language is represented by a distinct character. Hiragana as well as some cases of katakana are mostly used for the syllables in the most common combinations, like "ka" and "wa") and "ne" and "na"). The Japanese language uses kana, or "hiragana", and katakana, mixed with romaji to write Japanese in text. The syllables always appear with hiragana and katakana, and not romaji. "Hiragana" and "katakana" are Japanese terms but in Japan romaji is considered a foreign script and is not used. Since Japanese is an agglutinative language like Chinese and Korean, the syllables are attached together as the word is spoken
