Category:Television technologyAdvancing End-of-Life Care in Nursing Practice: A Multifaceted Approach. Nursing participation in the end-of-life care process and access to effective palliative and hospice care are imperative to achieve high-quality, cost-effective care that is aligned with the goals of patients and families. A significant barrier to optimal care is the lack of skilled nursing staff that specialize in end-of-life care. An interprofessional, innovative education model is described that was implemented to develop palliative care expertise for the service line. As part of this education effort, the authors integrated current end-of-life care best practices with universal palliative care principles to develop a protocolized approach to end-of-life care in the home.In previously known methods for processing liquid metal, such as aluminum electrolysis by the Hall-Heroult process, it has been customary to use molten cryolite as the solvent in the electrolysis cells, and sodium fluoride has been used as the salt for the electrolyte. The electrolyte of about 10% sodium fluoride in cryolite has been used at the temperatures of about 900.degree. C. and above. Certain difficulties were encountered in the operation of the Hall-Heroult process using electrolytes that contain about 10% of fluoride because of certain side reactions that occur in the electrolytes at high temperatures and the corrosion that the fluoride salt imparts to the cells. The fluoride salt forms soluble fluorides which, in turn, form soluble fluorides on the cell anodes and cathodes and cause the anodes and cathodes to dissolve. This results in the formation of smut on the anodes and cathodes, sometimes resulting in destruction of the anodes and cathodes. A number of different electrolytes have been investigated for the Hall-Heroult process in order to reduce the destructive effect of the fluoride salt on the cell anodes. Among these are the use of various fluorides such as sodium fluoride, potassium fluoride, or ammonium fluoride. Some have used various organic liquids such as alcohols, glycols, or ketones, or various gaseous fluids such as hydrogen, carbon dioxide, chlorine, hydrogen chloride, or fluorine. Of course, the use of these other fluoride salts has not completely eliminated the corrosive effect of the fluoride salt on the cell anodes and cathodes. However, as a result of extensive investigation of the use of these other fluoride salts in the
