Maybe you could show me a working example of the code, thanks for help! A: Smart pointers are an improvement to regular pointers. This means that they manage memory on your behalf. The automatic memory management of the regular pointers is quite safe, but the memory management of the smart pointers is much more convenient (and safe). If you want to use smart pointers, then the simplest way to manage memory is to simply use a unique pointer. If you want your pointers to be unique, then make them a Smart pointer type, like so: `std::unique_ptr my_obj(new MyType());` This takes the place of `std::auto_ptr`, which has been the defacto standard for smart pointers in C++ for a while now. (You can still use a regular pointer, but then you need to manually manage the memory). A: In addition to the implicit conversion there is also the constructor: `Pointer(const Item &item) { m_buffer = &item; } Pointer(Pointer const &other) { m_buffer = other.m_buffer; }` 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to a semiconductor memory, and more particularly, to a method for programming and verifying a semiconductor memory device. 2. Discussion of the Related Art Semiconductor memories commonly employ an array of memory cells, each cell having a transistor serving as a switch. By controlling the state of the transistor, the memory cell can store a one or a zero in the cell. In such memory cells, the transistor has a floating gate and a control gate. The transistor serves as the switch and the one or zero, respectively, is stored in the cell by varying the voltage on the control gate and the electrical field generated by the floating gate. One method for programming
