I have heard from somewhere that when a mother breast feeds a newborn, colostrum is produced for the first two weeks after birth. What is the approximate age at which this stops? A: I do not have an answer for the individual question but I think that the summary answer in brief is: 1. While a newborn in a mother's arms is obviously getting milk, after a few weeks the mother will be producing colostrum (of course with enough privacy) 2. After a while the baby starts taking milk from a bottle and not from the breast and it stops receiving colostrum 3. The baby's immune system is ready for mother's colostrum and starts to react with "immunity by milk" 4. With colostrum the baby gets a perfect colostrum-milk ratio. That's the reason for preterm babies and the pure milk syndrome getting so sick. You don't want to introduce preterm babies with milk with a higher fat-to-protein ratio than colostrum 5. Colostrum is not something that is "produced for the first two weeks after birth" - it is being produced for the whole first year of life! 6. Colostrum is the key to all the wonders of milk (besides the nutrition itself) Purple plaque aortitis with amyloidosis: report of a case. Purple plaque aortitis is a chronic, rare aortic aneurysm characterized by infiltration of the media and adventitia by basophilic eosinophilic material and acute or subacute aortic obstruction caused by intramural thrombus. Affected patients have been described as having a risk of aortic rupture. A 65-year-old man presented with an aortic aneurysm and symptoms of acute aortic syndrome. On echocardiography, a mass in the aortic arch was detected
