Diagnostic methods to evaluate acute renal injury, as acute renal failure, are scarce. Renal Doppler evaluation could be useful for the diagnosis and guidance of therapy of acute renal injury, mainly among patients with cardio-pulmonary resuscitation after cardiac arrest, since it is a non-invasive technique. To investigate the utility of renal Doppler evaluation in the diagnosis of acute kidney injury (AKI) after cardiac arrest and cardiac surgery. We carried out a prospective observational study of adult patients undergoing renal Doppler evaluation after cardiac arrest or cardiac surgery, and who did not receive renal replacement therapy. The patients were followed up to 16 months. We analyzed, among other variables, the sensitivity and specificity of renal Doppler evaluation for the diagnosis of AKI. We selected 95 patients with an average age of 45 years. In eight (8.4%) patients renal Doppler evaluation did not show significant abnormalities; 23 (24.2%) had functional impairment. The sensitivity of the renal Doppler was 66.67% with a specificity of 100% in the diagnosis of AKI. In patients submitted to cardiac surgery, the sensitivity of renal Doppler was 70.00% and specificity was 80.00%. Renal Doppler ultrasound evaluation can be useful in the diagnosis of AKI in patients undergoing cardiac arrest or cardiac surgery with good accuracy. Ashlie Assensohn is a successful realtor who has sold about $3-million worth of homes and is now taking on a new venture, being an example for teenage girls to follow. When Ashlie was in Grade 11, she noticed that her friends from school were going to college while she was going to after-school activities or spending hours helping her dad work on his car and watch B-movies. “I wanted to be part of something
